"The Golden Secret," at the popular Dreamland to-day. No suffering is so acute as the pang of thirst. They sap vitality, ambition, reason and leave the thirty one limp and dying, while visions of running brooks and shady springs torture his fevered senses and encourage him briefly to try to reach them, only to be mocked in taunting manner by the unattainable.

A Navajo Indian has crossed the great desert, and his water bottle has been emptied. He is in a frenzy from thirst and sees mirages of water everywhere. He comes upon Nat Perry, a young settler, who is conveying his household goods across the burning sands. Perry has just taken a drink from his precious canteen, when the Indian falls at his feet and implores a little water. The young pioneer heartlessly turns him over with his foot and leaves him to die.
